-  This bleeding bowl appears to be the second earliest English specimen known to exist, and is therefore of the highest interest. It is one year later than the specimen sold at Sotheby's March 28th, 1935; it is earlier by six years than the specimen in the Victoria & Albert Museum; and together with another in an English private Collection, and a specimen of 1641, which was sold at Sotheby's on June 14, 1934, is one of the five known bleeding bowls which date from before the Commonwealth.

- 130 AN EXCEEDINGLY RARE STUART SPOUT CUP in form similar to a pewter measure, of baluster shape, undecorated except for horizontal lines, the cover plain and nearly flat, the scroll handle joined by a thumb-piece cast on one side with a shell, on the other with a bacchic mask; the long thin spout tapering upwards from the base, mid 17th Century, $4\frac{3}{4}$ in. high—wt. 8 ozs. 12 dwts.

 The marks on this piece are of considerable interest, though no certain town of origin has yet been found for them. They are four in number and consist of what appears to be a leopard's face, uncrowned, the initials TS interlaced, a capital G, and a small fleur-de-lys. They appear in Sir Charles Jackson, "English Goldsmiths and their Marks", under Lincoln, the TS being ascribed to Timothy Skottowe of Norwich. This ascription, however, is unlikely, as these marks have appeared since on a trifold spoon of about 1674, a date subsequent to Timothy Skottowe's working years. This spoon appears in the Benett-Stanford Provincial Catalogue, no. 77, and the subject is discussed at length in the foreword to the Group of which no. 77 forms a part.
